Letting Go

When his daughter had announced that she had made an important decision - an announcement casually dropped into the telephone conversation they had had before their lunch at the Canny Man's in Morningside Road - Dr Macgregor had experienced a distressingly familiar pang of dread. Ever since Pat had chosen to spend her gap year in Australia, he had been haunted by the possibility that she would leave Scotland and simply not return. Australia was a world away, and it was full of possibilities. Anybody might be forgiven for going to Melbourne or Sydney - or even to Perth - and discovering that life in those places was fuller than the one they had led before. There was more space in Australia, and more light - but it was also true that there was there an exhilarating freedom, precisely the sort of freedom that might appeal to a nineteen-year-old. And there were young men, too, who must have been an additional lure. She might meet one of these and stay forever, forgetful of the fact that vigorous Australian males within a few years mutated into homo Australiensis suburbis*, into drinkers of beer and into addicts of televised footie, butterflies, thus, into caterpillars.

So he had spent an anxious ten months wondering whether she would come back to Scotland and upbraiding himself constantly about the harbouring of such fears. He knew that it was wrong for parents to think this way, and had told many of his own patients that they should stop worrying about their offspring and let go. "You must be able to let go," he had said, on countless occasions. "Your children must be allowed to lead their own lives." And even as he uttered the words he realised the awful banality of what he said; but it was difficult, was it not, to talk about letting go without sounding like a passage from Kahlil Gibran's The Prophet, which had views on such matters. The trouble with The Prophet was that it all sounded so profound when you first encountered it, and yet it was the sort of thing that one grew out of - just as one grew out of Jack Kerouac. It was entirely appropriate to have The Prophet on one's shelves in one's early twenties, but not, he thought, in one's forties, or beyond. One must be prepared to let go of The Prophet.

And although he gave this advice to people, he found it difficult - almost impossible, in fact - to practise it himself. He and his wife, Maureen, had only one child; she was their future, not only in the genetic sense, but in an emotional one too. In the case of Dr Macgregor himself, this was particularly true. He enjoyed cordial relations with Maureen, but there was a distance between them which he realised could never be bridged. It had been apparent from the earliest years of the marriage that they really shared very few interests, and had little to talk about. Her energies were focused on public causes and on her own, largely dysfunctional family. She had two difficult sisters and one difficult brother, and these siblings had duly spawned difficult and demanding children. So while she nominally lived in Edinburgh, in reality she spent a great deal of her time moving from relative to relative, coping with whatever crisis had freshly emerged. The sister in Angus - the one who drank - was particularly demanding. This manipulative sister really wanted Maureen to live with her, and to this end she longed for Maureen's widowhood, and said as much, which was tactless. There are many women whose lives would be immeasurably improved by widowhood, but one should not always point that out.

The absenteeism of his wife had its natural consequence. Pat became for him the focus of his family feeling; she was his best friend, and, to the extent that the father and daughter relationship permitted, his confidante. Of course he knew of the dangers of this; that the investing of one's entire world in a child was to give a powerful hostage to fortune, and that he should develop other friendships and ties. But he had somehow failed to do that.

So it was natural that he should feel trepidation about any decision that Pat should make, because that decision could always be to go back to Australia. That was what he dreaded above all else, because he knew that if she did that, he would lose her. He wanted her to stay in Edinburgh, or go to Glasgow at the most. Her choice of St Andrews University was perfect in his mind; that was just up the road and completely unthreatening. Now, in the cluttered surroundings of the Canny Man's, he steeled himself for impending loss. "You said that you'd made a major decision?"

Pat looked at her father. "Yes. I've decided not to go to St Andrews after all."

He caught his breath. She was returning to Australia. How few were the words needed to end a world.

Text 3 – Poem

The Immigrant's Song

Let us not speak of those days when coffee beans filled the morning with hope, when our mothers' headscarves hung like white flags on washing lines.
Let us not speak of the long arms of sky that used to cradle us at dusk.
And the baobabs—let us not trace the shape of their leaves in our dreams, or yearn for the noise of those nameless birds that sang and died in the church's eaves.
Let us not speak of men,
stolen from their beds at night.
Let us not say the word disappeared.

Let us not remember the first smell of rain.
Instead, let us speak of our lives now—
the gates and bridges and stores.
And when we break bread in cafés and at kitchen tables with our new brothers, let us not burden them with stories of war or abandonment.
Let us not name our old friends who are unravelling like fairy tales in the forests of the dead.
Naming them will not bring them back.
Let us stay here, and wait for the future to arrive, for grandchildren to speak in forked tongues about the country we once came from.

Tell us about it, they might ask.
And you might consider telling them of the sky and the coffee beans,
the small white houses and dusty streets.
You might set your memory afloat like a paper boat down a river.
You might pray that the paper whispers your story to the water, that the water sings it to the trees,
that the trees howl and howl it to the leaves. If you keep still and do not speak, you might hear your whole life fill the world until the wind is the only word.

No Friend but the Mountains: Writing from Manus Prison

Where have I come from? From the land of rivers, the land of waterfalls, the land of ancient chants, the land of mountains... People would run to the mountains to escape the warplanes and found asylum within their chestnut forests... Do Kurds have any friends other than the mountains?

The Raft of Purgatory/Moons Will Tell Terrible Truths

*Rescued. Relocated/
A second boat/
Another journey from Indonesia/
Another trial; a test of the will/
Unsure we will reach safety/
Purgatory*.*

The scorching sun is branded right into the middle of the sky. In the most intimate way possible, that searing sun shrouds the ocean, which resembles a warped mirror extending far away ... boundless. The waves approach and depart, occasionally rocking our small white fishing vessel which rests beside a grand cargo ship, as massive as a building. Our small craft is like a tiny pebble lying serenely under the shadow of a weighty boulder. The sun appears larger than usual; its radiation streams down, melting skin, smelting us, perhaps the only creatures on that enormous expanse, that wide open sea.

The British cargo ship above us is packed with red and blue containers, arranged so that they reach up to the ceiling of sky, a sky that doesn't host a single cloud. From the deck the sailors aim hoses at our boat and its passengers, soaking us, a people whose scent now embodies the sea. Hairy-chested men compete to take showers – committing acts of stupidity just to rinse themselves under the hot sun. They are all in a frenzy to get one over on another. The women are collapsed on seats on the lower level of the boat, sitting shoulder to shoulder on dilapidated red chairs. Some hold small children in their arms, little kids with bruised and swollen lips.

I can't fully make out the sailors from where I stand on the deck of our boat below. Only their blond heads are visible. It's easy to imagine their eyes; blue eyes, eyes the colour of the ocean. The ocean we have been rescued from. The sailors pull up the hoses and moments later a small platform is lowered down to the deck of our boat with individual packets of biscuits, containers of water, and numerous packages of cigarettes; it descends from above as the men aboard reach out their hands from below. The whole encounter with that British ship has been characterised by extraordinary kindness. We have quite forgotten about the violence, insults, swearing, and tears of our previous experiences with the authorities.

When they saw these offerings, you could see the men's spirits lifting. Each one fights to claim the largest share of the small load. Those married men – men whose wives were left stranded on the lower floor – exert greater effort than the rest. They raise hell until they can clutch a few extra packets of biscuits. They seem to be displaying a form of exuberant masculinity, driven by their overwhelming sense of duty, by a responsibility to fill the stomachs of their families, to feed them at any cost. Wild wolves all of them, hungry wolves, devouring and ripping at entrails. Every now and then they snarl at one another.

After this scrum, the young men immediately light up cigarettes ... soiling the air with murky smoke, polluting like a dark cloud. The top deck of the boat quickly becomes smothered in it.

They inhale that smoke with deep desire – it journeys through lungs, through stomachs, through dry intestines, through barren intestines – the smoke that is exhaled is infused with the taste of starvation. The flavour of a few days of hunger.

There was no justice, none at all, no egalitarian solution, no morally just outcome.

Paper 1 – Texts and Human Experiences

Section I 20 marks

Question 1 (3 marks)

Outcomes Assessed: EA 12-1, EA 12-2, EA 12-3, EA 12-7

Targeted Performance Bands: 2-5

Criteria	Marks
• Explains effectively the ways the text reveals hope as integral to human endeavor using aptly chosen textual evidence	3
• Explains ways the text reveals hope as integral to human endeavor using supporting textual evidence	2
• Provides some information about the text in response to the question	1

Answers could include reference to the following:

- The image reveals hope as integral to the human experience through the salient image of the refugees, of different nationalities, and on foot, going on a difficult journey to make a new life somewhere else
- The colour saturation of the figures in the foreground, and the colours of the map and ocean, indicate the hope of those displaced, for a new life
- The shadowy figures in the background emphasise the scale of human movement owing to displacement
- The depiction of the physical places on the map suggests the endless, perhaps daunting opportunities available to the refugees/travellers. This is reinforced through the reference to “hope as limitless” in the caption, and thus reinforces the idea of hope being integral to human endeavour
- The caption refers to the idea that although the physical realities of human experiences may be limited, hope, and the imagination, is unlimited
- The depiction of a cross-section of the globe and the numerous displaced and diverse figures travelling it, represents hope as integral to human endeavour
- The largely green and blue colour palette could suggest fertile landscapes and thus hope for the future

- The movement and the vectors of the refugees, on foot, imply the hope required to begin and/or continue on a challenging journey thus representing hope as integral to human endeavour
- Both the caption, "The world of reality has its limits, the world of hope is limitless..." and the image of the world, represent hope as integral to human endeavour through the sheer scale suggested by the repetition of "world" and its vastness

Question 2 (4 marks)Outcomes Assessed: EA 12-1, EA 12-3, EA 12-5, EA 12-7Targeted Performance Bands: 2-6

Criteria	Marks
• Analyses effectively the tension between the emotions and the intellect in the father's contemplation of letting go, using well-chosen textual evidence	4
• Analyses the tension between the emotions and the intellect in the father's contemplation of letting go, using relevant textual evidence	3
• Explains the tension between the emotions and the intellect in the father's contemplation of letting go, using some textual evidence	2
• Describes aspects of the text, with some relevant information	1

Answers could include reference to the following:

- The tension between the emotions and the intellect in the father's experiences is emphasised through the emotive statement, "Dr Macgregor had experienced a distressingly familiar pang of dread," demonstrating his ongoing distress over his daughter's emerging independence
- The juxtaposing perspectives of the father's view of Australia as a land of possibilities is also contrasted against Australia as a land of stereotypes and clichés (less rationally founded)
- The interior monologue of the father represents his emotional state and contrasts with his intellectual and rational musings. The cognitive dissonance thus revealed highlights the difficulty of letting go, for him.
- homo Australiensis suburbis - a Latin phrase meaning, Australian suburban male, conveys satirical humour in the Doctor's critical consideration of the Australian male as a biological species – a mixture here suggesting the tension between the father's emotions and intellect
- The intertextual irony created by the reference to The Prophet by Kahlil Gibran
- The self-reflexive tone represents the father's awareness of his hypocritical attitude to the notion of his daughter's independence
- The rational tone in the third and fourth paragraph justifies his intellectual appreciation of the daughter's independence
- "And although he gave this advice to people, he found it difficult - almost impossible, in fact - to practise it himself" illustrates the conflict between the intellect and practice, accentuated by the conjunctions, "and although"
- The tension between emotion and intellect is also established through the conclusion of the text with the father's hypothesising about the nature of independence. The metaphor of intellectual strength against emotional pain is demonstrated in "... he steeled himself for impending loss."
- The interior monologue of the father powerfully reveals his story of impending loss as he contemplates the possible loss of his near-adult daughter striving for independence and adventure. The father's story emphasises the tension between the emotions and the intellect in his consideration of losing his beloved daughter and confidante.
- The self-reflexive tone represents the father's hypocritical attitude to the notion of his daughter's independence.

Question 3 (3 marks)Outcomes Assessed: EA 12-1, EA 12-2, EA 12-3, EA 12-5, EA 12-7*Targeted Performance Bands: 2-6

Criteria	Marks
• Skilfully analyses how the poem communicates the difficulty of conveying the trauma of lived experience using well-chosen textual evidence	3
• Explains how the poem communicates the difficulty of conveying the trauma of lived experience using some appropriate textual evidence	2
• Provides some information about the text in relation to the question	1

Answers could include reference to the following:

- The refrain like quality of "Let us not speak" which lyrically lists what the persona misses about the land of origin, and reinforces the idea of this being a "Song"
- The irony of the immigrant's tragic story of loss being a "song"
- The refrain "Let us not speak" emphasises the difficulty of conveying the trauma of lived experience which can only be understood by those who have had the same experiences
- The appeal to the senses in the listing: smell of "coffee beans", visual: "mothers' headscarves hung like white flags on washing lines", kinaesthetic – in the tracing "the shape of the [baobab] leaves in our dreams", sound, in the yearning "for the noise of those nameless birds" – this lived experience now in the past and cannot be spoken of meaningfully to make listeners appreciate what has been lost
- The idea that the smell of coffee beans "filled the morning with hope – a positive association and the "mothers' headscarves hung like white flags on washing lines" embodies in the simile positive/symbolic associations of peace
- The horror of "men stolen from their beds at night" cannot be described, the italicised word "disappeared" placed in a line of its own accentuating the horror
- "Let us not burden them with stories /of war or abandonment" the metaphor of "burden" suggests the weight of traumatic lived experience which must be borne by those who have experienced it, alone
- After the word "disappeared" the second stanza of the poem takes on a more sombre tone of "Let us not remember..." and "Let us not name our old friends/who are unravelling like fairy tales/in the forests of the dead" – what is offered instead is that less satisfactory 'settling' for what is the new life, "wait for the future to arrive"
- The pointlessness of trying to explain, "Naming them will not bring them (the dead) back"
- The past traumas will not be appreciated by "grandchildren [who] speak/ in forked tongues about the country/we once came from"- the metaphor of "forked tongues" insinuates their grandchildren getting the stories wrong, or not representing them correctly, or embellishing them so that the truth of the real, lived experience cannot survive
- The use of pronouns "we" and "them" or "their" suggests a divide, a lack of understanding between the immigrants and the new generation
- The ephemeral nature of memory and one's stories of traumatic lived experience, "you might set your memory afloat/like a paper boat down a river" and if "you do not speak, you might hear/ your whole life fill the world/until the wind is the only word"- the ephemerality contained in the image of the flimsiness of a paper boat and wind

Question 4 (4 marks)Outcomes Assessed: EA 12-1, EA 12-2, EA 12-3, EA 12-7, EA 12-8Targeted Performance Bands: 3-6

Criteria	Marks
• Explains effectively how the narrator uses contrast to express the spectrum of human emotion, using detailed and well- chosen textual evidence	4
• Explains how the narrator uses contrast to express the spectrum of human emotion, using relevant textual evidence	3
• Describes how the narrator uses contrast to express the spectrum of human emotion, using some textual evidence	2
• Provides some information about the text in relation to the question	1

Answers could include reference to the following:

- The smallness and fragility of their craft, “small white fishing vessel”, dwarfed by the “grand cargo ship, as massive as a building”
- The smallness of their craft, dwarfed by the boundlessness of the ocean, also the enormity of the searing sun overhead – all this evidence suggests the precarious situation or danger they are in
- The contrast between need – to take a shower provided by the hoses aimed at them, and competitiveness, “committing acts of stupidity just to rinse themselves under the hot sun” and “they are all in a frenzy to get one over on another”
- The contrast between the kindness of their “whole encounter with that British ship” now, and the forgotten “violence, insults, swearing, and tears of our previous experiences with the authorities.”
- The contrast between the married men’s desire to protect and provide for their wives and children, and their “exuberant masculinity” – “wild wolves all of them, hungry wolves.”
- The men are driven by an overwhelming sense of duty, or responsibility toward their families but it is making animals out of them, “every now and then they snarl at one another”.
- The “barren intestines” are “fed” by deep inhalation of smoke from the cigarettes. Ironically, and metaphorically, “the smoke that is exhaled is infused with the taste of starvation.”
- Contrast between married men and fathers and the wild animals they become in a desperate competition for survival

Question 5 (6 marks)Outcomes Assessed: EA 12-1, EA 12-3, EA 12-5, EA 12-6, EA 12-7, EA 12-8*Targeted Performance Bands: 3-6

Criteria	Marks
• Compares skilfully, using well-chosen textual evidence, how Text 3 and Text 4 represent the power of story to convey insights into the human spirit	6
• Compares effectively, using appropriate textual evidence, how Text 3 and Text 4 represent the power of story to convey insights into the human spirit	4-5
• Compares, using some textual evidence, how aspects of Text 3 and Text 4 represent the power of story to convey insights into the human spirit	3
• Describes aspects of the text with some relevant information	1-2

Answers could include reference to the following:

Both Text 3 and Text 4 represent the power of story to convey loss, grief, letting go and facing an uncertain and perhaps less rewarding way of life, in the necessity of moving forward. Text 3 represents the power of story in the form of a song to convey loss, grief, letting go and facing an uncertain but less rewarding way of life from the perspective of enforced immigration owing to war and conflict,

Both Text 3 and Text 4 represent the power of story to convey loss, displacement and forced migration and uncertainty and the effects of these on people's behaviour, that of men in particular in Raft of Purgatory-how such trauma or the need to survive, forces behavioural change in individuals. Text 3 represents the power of story in the form of a song, in the telling of which, the inclusive "we" is used, while Text 4 represents the wry commentary of an individual who is reflecting on what happened in his memoir; the reader gains the impression that he is disapproving or judgmental of the men's changed behaviour.

Text 3

- The "Song" of the immigrant is a personal story outlining the emotional impact on the persona and which arouses empathy for the plight of such immigrants who have not left their homeland out of choice
- The refrain like quality of "Let us not speak" lyrically lists what the persona misses about the land of origin, and reinforces the idea of this being a "Song"
- There is the irony of the immigrant's tragic story of loss being a "song" but the more accessible for its being one
- The refrain "Let us not speak" emphasises the difficulty of communicating the trauma of lived experience which can only be understood by those who have had the same experiences
- The idea that the smell of coffee beans "filled the morning with hope – a positive association and the "mothers' headscarves hung like white flags on washing lines" embodies in the simile symbolic associations of peace and tranquillity which will be no longer but conveys insights into the simple aspects of life which offer important insights into what is important
- The horror of "men stolen from their beds at night" and the idea of their having "disappeared" heightens the sense of uncertainty and loss and the impulse to "not burden [the new generation who will be born in a different place] with stories /of war or abandonment" the metaphor of "burden" suggests the weight of traumatic lived experience which must be borne by those who have experienced it, alone

- The pointlessness of trying to explain, “Naming them will not bring them (the dead) back”
- The past traumas will not be appreciated by “grandchildren [who] speak/ in forked tongues about the country/we once came from”- the metaphor of “forked tongues” insinuate that the stories will be changed, or not represented correctly, because retold without the benefit of lived experience
- The use of pronouns “we” and “them” or” their” suggests an inevitable divide, a lack of understanding between the immigrants and the new generation
- The ephemeral nature of memory and one’s stories, “you might set your memory afloat/like a paper boat down a river” and if “you do not speak, you might hear/ your whole life fill the world/until the wind is the only word”- the ephemerality contained in the image of the flimsiness of a paper boat and wind and effectively emphasises the difficulty of letting go of one’s past lived experience for the benefit of the new generation

- Text 4, a Memoir extract, tells the story of hardship and survival from the first-person point of view of a Kurdish-Iranian writer, of a desperate journey to safety from a war-torn country. Text 4 is thus comparable to Text 3 in that it is an immigrant’s story and a story of the difficulty of resettlement as a result of challenging circumstances. While the poem, The Immigrant’s Song, represents the power of story to convey loss, grief, letting go and facing an uncertain and perhaps less rewarding way of life, in the necessity of moving forward, the Raft of Purgatory extract conveys insights into aspects of the human spirit such as the descent of desperate men into a competitive, snarling, wild, wolfish scrum when driven by responsibility and duty, hunger and raw survival. Such people become subject to the whimsical behaviours of those in power, the “authorities”, who are capable of violence, insults, swearing” and also extreme kindness such as that shown by the encounter with the British ship.
- Further, insights into the human spirit of men exposed to extreme hardship when at the mercy of the vastness of the ocean and the relentless heat of the sun so that they feel “dwarfed”, show that they will “commit acts of stupidity just to rinse themselves under the hot sun” and “they are all in a frenzy to get one over on another” to “take a shower provided by hoses pointed at them” by sailors on the British ship – a dubious “kindness” but one which desperate men will grasp at, losing their dignity in the process .
- Compared to the silence, “Let us not speak of..”, and seemingly quiet resolve (“Let us not name our old [deceased] friends”) chosen by the immigrants in The Immigrant’s Song, these men exhibit a contrast between their desire to protect and provide for their wives and children, and their “exuberant masculinity” – “wild wolves all of them, hungry wolves.”
- The men are driven by an overwhelming sense of duty, or responsibility toward their families but it is making animals out of them, “every now and then they snarl at one another”. The insight into the human spirit being that of desperate measures taken when driven by desperate circumstances.
- The symbolism of the title Raft of Purgatory – purgatory suggests a place of temporary suffering or misery
